

Assignment 4 – Processing Fixed Length Record Data with Threads

Description:

This program processes emergency event data using multi-threading. It reads a structured data file containing emergency event records, parses the fields, and computes various statistics.

Approach:

The first thing I did when beginning this assignment is cloned the repository and carefully reviewed the provided instructions to understand all parts of the assignment. I learned that the dataset consists of fixed-length record (FLR) data which I was not previously familiar with, I first examined how FLR data is structured and how it can be parsed efficiently before writing any code. Each record in the dataset has a fixed size and can be determined by summing the widths of all fields as defined in provided header.txt. Understanding this important basic information allowed me to plan my approach. First and foremost, I planned on parsing the header file to extract field names and widths then compute the total record size and then move on to handling the binary data file containing the actual event records. Since the header.txt file defines the structure of every record in the dataset, the first step was to correctly parse it and extract the necessary information. Given that in the direction it mentioned that the assignment disallowed the use of standard C file handling functions like fgets(), I used the open() system call to access the file and read() to process it character by character. After each line in header.txt follows a <width>: <field_name> format, so I implemented a basic buffer to store each line while reading characters one at a time. Upon encountering a newline or \n character, I null-terminated the string and processed it using strtok(), using a colon as a delimiter. The extracted field width was converted to an integer using the library function atoi, while the field name was stored in a struct array meaning that each field's metadata was stored. I incremented a counter to track the number of fields read and continuously updated the total record size by summing all field widths so I could use this for the future such as when I needed to implement threads. To double check if this was working I wrote a testing helper function that printed the parsed field information. Initially, I encountered minor syntax errors due to some misusing of format specifiers in printf(), but I was able to debug it fairly easily and then confirmed that the parsing was functioning correctly. After double checking the program was parsing header.txt without issues, I started thinking about potential edge cases. I implemented edge cases for things such as malformed lines, missing delimiters, and exceeding predefined field limits. I handled these cases by ensuring that invalid entries were ignored and that field definitions exceeding the max number of fields(which i set arbitrary to a high number to avoid any larger issues) were skipped. With this step completed, I had successfully extracted the record structure and determined the total size of each record, allowing me to proceed with reading and processing event. The next step was checking the total records, given that all records are of equal length, this was straightforward using the formula $\text{totalRecords} = \text{fileSize} / \text{recordSize}$, where fileSize is obtained using the fstat function. With total number calculated I needed a way to read and extract each record. I used the `pread()`, which allows reading a specific portion of a file without changing the file pointer to do so.

Before moving on I wanted to design all of my data and how my program would work. to start to process event-related data, I designed several key data structures that would store all my important data info. The `FieldInfo` struct was used to store metadata about each field in the dataset, including its name and width. This allowed me to map field positions while parsing records. The primary structure I created for tracking event statistics was the `EventData` struct, which contained the event type name, occurrence count, and multiple arrays for storing time differences between key timestamps such as dispatch-received, on-scene-enroute, and on-scene-received. Since the assignment required tracking statistics for specific geographic areas, I also implemented the `AreaData` struct, which contained event breakdowns for two selected areas based on either police districts or neighborhoods. This structure included an array of `EventData` entries to track the unique event types occurring within each area so I could easily access the events in the area later on. The `StatResults` struct was introduced later on when computing the stats to store computed statistical values such as quartiles, mean, standard deviation, and outlier bounds. I used a global array `eventStats[]` to store the event statistics. I also maintained a global `selectedAreas[]` array to store statistics for the specified locations initializing to two locations(as was specified in directions).

To efficiently process event data between a range of events (set it up this way because useful when using threads), I implemented my processing event functions, which were responsible for extracting and analyzing event records within a given range, singular events, and for specific geographic areas. My goal was to ensure that data parsing and extraction were optimized for performance while remaining flexible enough to be processed efficiently by multiple threads. Initially, I attempted to read and process one record at a time, but I quickly realized that this approach was inefficient, especially when working with larger datasets. The overhead caused by excessive system calls slowed down performance significantly, as each call to `pread()` introduced additional lag which I found alter on. This led me to reevaluate my approach and implement batch processing to optimize the file operations. I dynamically allocated a buffer that could store multiple records at once which allowed the program to retrieve a chunk of data in a single `pread` call rather than making repeated calls for each individual record over and over again. The function responsible for reading records calculates the correct file offset for each batch based on the record size and the index range assigned to the current thread. Using this calculated offset, the function retrieves the required batch of records from the file using `pread()`. Once the data is loaded into memory, I implemented logic to iterate through each record in the buffer, extracting relevant field values such as event type, timestamps, and location. I relied on predefined field widths extracted from `header.txt` to correctly map the corresponding data to each field. To ensure that timestamps could be meaningfully compared and used for response time calculations, I implemented a timestamp conversion function. Since the dataset stores datetime values as strings in `MM/DD/YYYY HH:MM:SS AM/PM` format, I used `strptime()` to parse the string and convert it into a `tm` structure. From there, I used `mktime()` to transform the structured time into epoch time, allowing for numerical calculations. This conversion helped because response times, such as `dispatch_datetime - received_datetime` and `onscene_datetime - enroute_datetime`, had to be computed as integer differences in seconds. Without this conversion, directly manipulating datetime strings would have been very challenging. One issue I encountered was handling missing or invalid timestamps within event records. Since not all records contained properly formatted timestamps, I implemented logic to assign a default value of -1 to any time difference calculation that involved an invalid or missing timestamp. This prevented erroneous calculations from affecting the overall statistical results. I also implemented that when computing statistics later, any -1 values were ignored in mean, median, and quartile calculations. Once the extracted data was processed, it needed to be stored efficiently for later analysis. Since multiple instances of the same event type could appear in the dataset, I implemented a function to check whether an event type had already been recorded. If the event type was found in `eventStats[]`, its existing entry was updated by incrementing the count and appending new time difference values to the respective arrays. If the event type had not been encountered before, a new entry was created in `eventStats[]`, ensuring that every unique event was stored exactly once. When processing records, I checked whether the event's location matched one of the selected areas. If a match was found, the event's time difference values were appended to the `selectedAreas[]` array, which maintained a per-area breakdown of statistics. This structure allowed for efficient retrieval and aggregation of event statistics based on geographic location.

Also to specify or explain in more depth, I created three functions that make up a lot of this end result logic that help display and calculate all these stats to the user. The `computeAggregatedStatistics`, `computeTotalStatisticsByType`, and `computeAggregatedStatistics` functions. The `computeAggregatedStatistics` function summarizes the overall dataset. It iterates over all recorded event types stored in `eventStats` array, collecting time differences based on the specified category (`dispatch_received`, `onscene_enroute`, or `onscene_received`). It dynamically allocates memory to store these time differences. This function then calls `computeStats` to analyze the collected time differences and print the results, displaying minimum, maximum, quartiles, interquartile range (IQR), mean, and standard deviation. The `ComputeTotalStatisticsByType` function focuses on calculating and displaying statistics for each unique event type. It first calls `computeAggregatedStatistics` to present a total summary of all events before iterating through `eventStats` array to compute per-event statistics. Using `computeStats`, it analyzes individual event occurrences. To put this all together I created a function `printStatistics`. The `printStatistics` function serves as the final step in organizing and displaying all statistical results in a structured manner. It sequentially calls `computeTotalStatisticsByType` to generate overall statistics and then calls `computeAreaAggregatedStatistics` to compute area-specific statistics for the two selected areas. This all helps calculate the stats and display to user in a format that follows the directions.

Next I implemented the multithreading or step 3. To manage multithreading efficiently, I created the `ThreadArgs` struct, which stored parameters such as the data file path, assigned record range, and subfield index to ensure each thread processed a distinct portion of the dataset. To start off with main logic, each thread handles a subset of records independently, the number of records assigned to each thread is computed by dividing the total record count by the number of threads specified in the command-line arguments. Each thread receives its corresponding data subset and executes `processeventtyperange` in parallel while passing in the dedicated range. I wanted to be careful i implemented this and prevent data corruption when multiple threads update shared structures so I used the `pthread_mutex_lock` function. Before modifying `eventStats[]` or `selectedAreas[]`, each thread acquires a lock to ensure that no other thread modifies the data simultaneously. After updating the data, the thread releases the lock, allowing the next thread to proceed. Once all of the threads complete execution, the program aggregates collected statistics, computing all of the measures as defined in step 2 such as minimum, maximum, quartiles, and standard deviation.

I didn't describe this yet but I also split up my files so I didn't just have one main file with all of my code. I added and removed files across this whole process many different times so I feel as if it's best to explain my main thought process here now near the end now that all the core logic has been explained. I realized quickly that this would be a pretty long project with lots of code when getting started, so I decided to organize it into multiple files for better readability. I divided my code into several components such as `main.c`, `processing.h`, `processing.c`, `threading.h`, `threading.c`, `stats.h`, `stats.c`, `helper.h`, and `helper.c`. Here is a little description of each file. The `main.c` file serves as the main entry point, handling CL args, initializing variables, spawning threads, and printing the final statistics. The `processing.c` and `processing.h` files contain functions responsible for parsing the header file, extracting and processing records, and computing time differences. I dedicated `threading.c` and `threading.h` to managing multithreading operations which I found helpful in separating the threading logic. This included thread creation, workload distribution, and synchronization using the mutex locks. For the stats calculations, I created `stats.c` and `stats.h`, which handled all metric computations such as mean, median, quartiles, standard deviation, and interquartile range. Additionally, I implemented `helper.c` and `helper.h` to contain small utility functions that I didn't know where else to put like timestamp conversion and memory management. By structuring my code this way, it helped me a lot with debugging and changing main core components.

One thing I also added was given the extensive use of dynamically allocated structures for storing event statistics, I implemented a dedicated memory cleanup function that deallocates all allocated memory at the end of execution. This function frees memory for `eventStats[]` and `selectedAreas[]`, ensuring that the program does not leave unnecessary memory allocated. I also created a memory allocation function that does the opposite, and allocates memory instead. This was to make sure I was handling my memory correctly by making it really readable for my main memory operations.

To evaluate the efficiency of the multithreaded implementation, I measured execution time using the timing functions provided by the assignment. I described these results in the analysis section (so no need to repeat). After successfully implementing everything, I made sure to re-read the directions and add the finishing touches by adding comments where I didn't previously add them.

Issues and Resolutions:

My first big issue was my program crashing due to memory allocation issues. I was trying to allocate memory dynamically with `malloc` and `free` but believe the way in which I was doing so was inefficient for the larger data files. When running make run on smaller files (everything up to 100K) it worked fine but when trying to run 500k and above it would just crash.

To resolve the memory allocation issue, I analyzed how I was allocating memory for eventStats as well as my other data structs. I was allocating memory for eventStats and selectedAreas[].areaEvents as large static arrays upfront, which worked fine for smaller datasets but I believe led to memory allocation failures for larger ones. The error message indicated that my program was unable to allocate sufficient memory when dealing with the 500K dataset, but remember when dealing with the 100k dataset everything was fine. This told me core logic was probably okay and it was a memory issue. My first step to fix this was I adjusted my approach in the allocateMemory function. Instead of relying on static allocation for eventStats, I used malloc() to allocate memory dynamically based on MAX_EVENTS. However, I quickly realized that maxevents might be set to an arbitrarily high value that was unnecessary, leading to excessive memory consumption. Because when I ran with a smaller value it didn't crash. To fix this fully, I adjusted maxevents to a more reasonable size based just running it a bunch of times with different values to see what worked. Additionally, I applied a similar approach to selectedAreas[].areaEvents, making sure that each area only allocated memory for the necessary number of events rather than a large fixed buffer. I also investigated whether memory fragmentation was contributing to the issue because I know in class the professor talked about being very careful with this. To reduce this, I double checked that I was not overallocating memory unnecessarily and that memory was being freed properly when no longer needed. I modified my freeMemory function to correctly deallocate memory for both eventStats and selectedAreas[].areaEvents, setting the pointers to NULL after freeing to avoid potential dangling pointers. The last change I made was modifying my batch processing approach to avoid excessive memory usage. Previously I was allocating a buffer for batch processing that was too large for larger datasets, leading to high memory consumption. I experimented with different batch sizes and found that reducing records_per_batch helped mitigate the issue. After making these changes, I tested my program again on progressively larger datasets. The 500K dataset, which previously failed due to memory allocation errors, now executed successfully.

The next main issue I encountered was when implementing my threads, running with 1, 2, and 4 threads were not working as expected. For example when running with no threads(1) it was the quickest, 2 was the second quickest, 4 was the third, and 8 was the last. This meant my threads were doing the opposite of the expected behavior. This suggested that my multithreading was not working efficiently, as increasing the number of threads should have ideally resulted in reduced execution time.

My first approach to diagnosing the problem was to analyze the time taken in between thread locking operations to determine if excessive mutex locking was the issues. To do this, I added timing statements before and after the lock acquisition and release points to measure how long each thread was waiting. However, after running the program multiple times and examining the results, I found that the mutex lock was not a major factor. The recorded times showed that thread locks were held for extremely short durations (less than 0.000xxx seconds), meaning that contention for shared resources was not significantly slowing down execution.

Since locking was not the problem, my next approach was to verify whether the workload was being evenly distributed among threads. If one thread was processing significantly more data than others, it could create a bottleneck and lead to performance issues, I didn't expect this to be the case because the calculations were fairly simple but thought it was worth a try to look into. I modified my program to print the record range assigned to each thread and tracked the number of records processed by each one. The output confirmed that the dataset was being properly split among the available threads and that each was handling approximately the same number of records.

After confirming that workload distribution and locking mechanisms were not the main causes, I shifted my focus to how records were being read from the file. I had already implemented a basic approach where each thread would read and process one record at a time. I thought this was fine but I spent a lot of time looking into it and read that something like this could possibly lead to excessive system calls. As every read operation required invoking `pread()` separately for each record basically means a high frequency of system calls could be introducing unnecessary overhead and that's why with more threads it was acting slower. To address this, I modified my approach to implement batch processing. Instead of reading one record at a time, each thread would read a larger chunk of records in a single system call. To do this I dynamically allocated a buffer that allowed multiple records to be read at once, reducing the number of system calls and improving performance.

I re-ran the program and observed a noticeable improvement in execution time. The results showed that performance improved significantly. But however, while execution times were reduced, there was still not a perfect scaling where doubling the number of threads cut execution time in half. This suggested that while batch processing helped, there were still other inefficiencies at play. I did a lot to investigate these, one of the remaining factors I suspect is related to memory bandwidth limitations, as increasing the number of threads increases the number of concurrent memory accesses. I experimented a lot but was never fully able to get the threads working as expected. The difference in execution time between 1, 2, 4, and 8 threads is not as bad but still not perfect. In the analysis section, I explore further potential reasons why performance does not increase proportionally with the number of threads. However, through this debugging process, I was able to significantly reduce execution time which was still a slight success. (as seen below from 35 seconds to 30 seconds with 4 threads when running Law_Full). Coming back to this as well(as explained in analysis), part of the issue here is I was running the full law dataset instead of smaller versions. When running smaller the threading actually works better meaning this change helped as in the beginning even running on small dataset threads were not working as expected.

Analysis:

Part 1:

The police response times provide some good insights into the efficiency and effectiveness of emergency response. I looked at some of the timestamps from my response and was able to assess variations in response times across different call categories, time periods, and locations. It was pretty cool to see the average response time across all incidents to see how fast police intervention actually is taking place. It is nice how all this data is available, so you can examine how maybe a certain area takes longer than another because of geography or other factors such as traffic, distance etc. It was also really interesting to see all the call types, I would have never guessed all of these existed and even very specific ones such as RAT, PROWLER, BONFIRE etc. To keep this fairly simple I just looked at the totals for the 500K dataset. I did this because there is so much data and locations here that drawing conclusions from specific areas to one another might be pretty challenging to do accurately.

One of the things I could easily draw that I thought was very interesting things was how much variation there was between different types of incidents. For example, violent crimes like assaults and armed robberies had significantly lower response times compared to property crimes like burglaries or vandalism. This makes sense because police prioritize life-threatening situations, but the gap was still noticeable when looking at the actual averages in totals some even ranged around a couple of minutes. Additionally, some of the highest response times appeared to be outliers which showed up in the data dump. Certain cases showed extreme delays of 40 minutes or more which would be concerning if you needed help and was waiting. Although these were probably really uncommon and have a good reason, seeing this still was a little shock to me. I also saw some outliers for fast response times, some cases under a minute, this could mean that the officer was already next to the situation. Overall, it was really interesting looking at the data and being able to draw some of these conclusions.

Part 2:

Looking at the execution times for processing the 500K dataset, there is a clear improvement in performance as the number of threads increases. As shown in the execution section, a single thread, the process took 5.69 seconds, but by utilizing 2, 4, and then 8 threads, the time gradually decreased to 4.998, 4.89, and 4.488 seconds. This follows the expected trend where parallel processing helps distribute the workload, leading to more efficient execution. However, the diminishing returns suggest that while adding more threads helps, the improvement isn't actually that easy to understand. My main guess is that other factors such as thread management overhead, context switching, or even limitations in how well the task can be parallelized. Given that the drop in execution time between 4 and 8 threads is only about 0.4 seconds, it suggests that past a certain point, adding more threads doesn't provide significant benefits.

This is also seen when looking at the results from running the full dataset. These results show a different and harder to understand trend. With a single thread, the process took 27.2 seconds, but rather than improving with more threads, the execution time actually increased randomly. At 2 threads, the time rose to 29 seconds, and at 4 threads, it further increased to 30 seconds before dropping slightly to 26.8 seconds at 8 threads. This suggests that the workload for the full dataset is either not well-suited for parallelization in this case or that there are bottlenecks preventing in my code that prevent multi-threading from being efficient. One possible explanation is that the dataset is too large for efficient memory management in the way in which I have my code setup meaning when multiple threads are running it could lead to cache misses or increased contention for shared resources. Additionally one of the main things I think still has a really big impact with a larger dataset is, I/O operations, such as reading or writing data, because it can become a bottleneck if multiple threads are competing for access to the same resources. The slight improvement at 8 threads suggests that there might be a point where parallelization starts to provide benefits again, but overall, these results indicate that simply increasing the number of threads does not always guarantee better performance, especially for larger datasets in this case.
